

Opinion of the Court

the Ninth Circuit concluded that Robins' complaint alleges "concrete, de facto" injuries for essentially two reasons. 742 F. 3d, at 413. First, the court noted that Robins "alleges that Spokeo violated his statutory rights, not just the statutory rights of other people." Ibid. Second, the court wrote that "Robins's personal interests in the handling of his credit information are individualized rather than collective." Ibid. (emphasis added). Both of these observations concern particularization, not concreteness. We have made it clear time and time again that an injury in fact must be both concrete and particularized. See, e.g., Susan B. Anthony List v. Driehaus, 573 U.S. 149, 158 (2014); Summers, supra, at 493; Sprint Communications Co. v. APCC Services, Inc., 554 U.S. 269, 274 (2008); Massachusetts v. EPA, 549 U.S. 497, 517 (2007).

A "concrete" injury must be "de facto"; that is, it must actually exist. See Black's Law Dictionary 506 (10th ed. 2014). When we have used the adjective "concrete," we have meant to convey the usual meaning of the term—"real," and not "abstract." 1 Webster's Third New International Dictionary 472 (1971); Random House Dictionary of the English Language 305 (1966). Concreteness, therefore, is quite different from particularization.

"Concrete" is not, however, necessarily synonymous with "tangible." Although tangible injuries are perhaps easier to recognize, we have confirmed in many of our previous cases that intangible injuries can nevertheless be concrete. See, e.g., Pleasant Grove City v. Summum, 555 U.S. 460 (2009) (free speech); Church of Lukumi Babalu Aye, Inc. v. Hialeah, 508 U.S. 520 (1993) (free exercise).

In determining whether an intangible harm constitutes injury in fact, both history and the judgment of Congress play important roles. Because the doctrine of standing derives from the case-or-controversy requirement, and because that
